the 1990s, the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia has increased in many countries (1).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the quality of life of people with schizophrenia, and the need to address the social and psychological consequences of the illness (2). The World Health Organization (WHO) has developed a number of instruments to measure the quality of life of people with schizophrenia (3).

The WHO Quality of Life (QoL) instrument is a self-rated measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia (4). It consists of 26 items, each rated on a scale from 1 to 5.

The WHO QoL instrument has been used in a number of studies of people with schizophrenia (5, 6). It has been found to be a valid and reliable measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia (7).

The purpose of this study was to investigate the relationship between the WHO QoL instrument and the clinical characteristics of people with schizophrenia.

The study was conducted in a community mental health centre in London. The centre provides a range of services for people with schizophrenia, including day care, residential care, and out-patient services.

The study was approved by the local research ethics committee. All participants gave their informed consent before taking part in the study.

The study was conducted over a period of 12 months. A total of 100 people with schizophrenia were recruited to the study.

The participants were recruited through a number of sources, including the community mental health centre, local newspapers, and social networks.

The participants were interviewed at their homes. The interviews were conducted by a research fellow who had experience of conducting interviews with people with schizophrenia.

The interviews lasted approximately 45 minutes. The participants were asked to complete the WHO QoL instrument and to answer a number of questions about their clinical characteristics.

The clinical characteristics measured included the duration of illness, the number of hospital admissions, and the current level of medication.

The WHO QoL instrument was found to be a valid and reliable measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia. It was found to be significantly correlated with the clinical characteristics measured.

The results of the study suggest that the WHO QoL instrument is a useful measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia. It can be used to identify people who are at risk of poor quality of life and to develop interventions to improve their quality of life.

The study has a number of strengths. It was a large study, and it included a wide range of people with schizophrenia. It was also a longitudinal study, which allowed us to investigate the relationship between the WHO QoL instrument and the clinical characteristics of people with schizophrenia over time.

There are a number of limitations to the study. The study was conducted in a community mental health centre, and the results may not be generalizable to other settings. The study also had a number of methodological limitations, including the use of a self-rated measure of quality of life and the use of a convenience sample.

In conclusion, the WHO QoL instrument is a valid and reliable measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia. It is significantly correlated with the clinical characteristics of people with schizophrenia. The study suggests that the WHO QoL instrument is a useful measure of the quality of life of people with schizophrenia.
